

When you're walking around a city, you usually forget to look up devblogs.microsoft.com/oldnewthing/20081124-01

November 24, 2008

Raymond Chen

When you're walking around a city, you usually forget to look up. It takes a landmark building to prompt you to admire anything above the ground floor.

For those in the Seattle area, the Seattle Times included a brief walking tour of Seattle architecture. The article doesn't mention one of my favorites: The roll-on deodorant building on the corner of Seneca and Second. The effect is most striking if you if you stand on Second and Union and look southeast at night. (Sadly, under the dome is just a roomful of machines.)

Raymond Chen

Follow